A case of tuberous enlargement of the kidneys due to malaria has been reported for the first time in the literature. It occurred in a 2-year-old boy from Madagascar with Plasmodium falciparum malaria. The tuberous lesions regressed within a week of antibiotic therapy and antimalarial treatment with chloroquine phosphate, and the boy made a good recovery. The importance of chloroquine as a suitable regimen for the treatment of renal enlargement due to malaria is emphasized. The role of specific antituberculous drugs as therapeutic adjuncts in the management of the renal enlargement due to malaria is discussed. The study confirms that far too many primary-school children are carrying heavy loads of sugar, fat and other unhealthy ingredients in their packed lunches, by Tom Chivers Britain's children are consuming more fast food than ever before, and their packed lunches are a major source of the problem, a study has found. According to a Food Standards Agency (FSA) report, fast food sales on Britain's high streets have increased by some 4,000% in the last 40 years, rising from about 80 food outlets per 10,000 people in 1961 to more than 3,700 outlets per 10,000 people in 2010. But eating unhealthy lunches is not just a modern conundrum. It's one that stretches back to the age of dinosaurs. The FSA's report found that, thanks to the rise of food packaging, the lunch habits of schoolchildren today are more unsustainable than they were almost 60 years ago, despite the availability of supermarkets
