A mechanism by which neurons may regulate synapse number is unknown. Here, we propose to test the hypothesis that secreted peptides produced by neurons, which we named neuromediators, regulate synapse density during development. In particular, we propose to study the function of the neuropeptide NGF, and we focus on the neuromodulator, dopamine, in order to study the phenomenon of synapse elimination that occurs during development. Dopamine levels vary dramatically during development. In particular, dopamine is less expressed in the neonatal brain than in the adult, and dopamine levels increase progressively in the brain during development. During the initial period of synapse elimination (a time defined as "sensitive period"), the density of synapses decreases to 50% of the adult number. During the later period (reminiscence), dopamine levels increase and synapse density returns to the adult value. In Specific Aim #1 we will examine the density of synapses in the neonatal rat brain after ablation of dopaminergic neurons or administration of a dopamine receptor antagonist, to attempt to identify whether the dopamine signal that regulates synapse density is delivered directly to the presynaptic terminals or whether it acts via the postsynaptic neurons. In Specific Aim #2, we will examine the effect of NGF on synapse density and on the expression of receptors to NGF. In Specific Aim #3, we will test whether dopamine is able to induce expression of NGF in the brain. Our preliminary results indicate that NGF is expressed in the developing brain, and that it is required for the later phase of synapse elimination, suggesting that it might play a critical role in the mechanism of synapse elimination. Understanding how synapse elimination occurs during development has significant implications for clinical treatments of individuals with learning disabilities and mental retardation and for potential strategies designed to prevent neuronal loss in other diseases, such as Parkinson's disease.

Q: Can I see the source code of a compiled Ruby 1.9 file? I have a file that was previously Ruby 1.8.7. The file got edited by someone else and has differences between the original and the edited versions. Because the compiled file is so large (800MB!) I want to try to debug it. I noticed that a patched version of the 1.9 has been released so I thought I could grab the source and compile that. The problem is that I cannot remember where the original source code is stored (I think the code was in the file vendor

Cloning can be applied to areas such as faces, hair, clothing, text, animals, or still life, as well as entire images, whether the subject of the image is moving or not. The Distress Brush is one of the more advanced tools that come with Photoshop, and is used to imitate actual stains and dents found on real leather, wood, and stone. The Eraser is used to erase parts of an image and other tools include the Spot Healing Brush, the Magic Wand, and the Marquee tool. The Magic Wand is used to select an area of the image to be edited. Using the Magic Wand, you can quickly select a range of areas by "feeling" out the edges of the desired selection, or even select an area of the image by clicking once or twice anywhere within the desired selection area. The Paint Bucket tool is used to fill an area with a color or gradient. The Pen tool is used to create paths and then apply effects to these paths. You can then use the Pen tool to either create a stroke, or erase a path with a brush, or use the Stroke tool to apply a different color. The Path Selection tool allows you to create many different types of paths, including: Curves Rectangles Ellipses Curve Fitting The Pen tool is used to draw an outline or outline, be it of a path or a shape. The Smooth and Hard Round brushes are round brushes that come in really useful for cleaning up hard edges created by the Pen tool. The Round Corner selection tool allows you to round corners of objects that need to be cleanly cut. The Shadow/Highlight tool allows you to use two colors to create a shadow and highlight in the same area. The Sharpen tool sharpens the edges of an image. The Spot Healing Brush is a quick and easy way to make repairs in an image. It uses the same principle as the Clone Stamp, but works much faster. The Spot Healing Brush tool is similar to the Clone Stamp tool in that it allows you to use an area of an image to use in an area on the rest of the image. The Gradient tool allows you to paint a gradual change of colors. You can create a gradient by selecting a section of an image and then changing the gradient color range. The Gradient tool is used to select colors, create a
